Unlike typical public sector salaries, the CTU president's compensation is often funded through union dues and may include a combination of base salary and additional stipends. The salary reflects the significant responsibilities involved in representing thousands of teachers and leading collective bargaining efforts.

Salary Range and Structure

Typically, the CTU president's salary ranges between $150,000 and $200,000 annually, though exact figures can vary based on the union's financial health and decisions made by the executive board. The salary is designed to compensate for full-time leadership duties, which often extend beyond the traditional workday. This range places the CTU president's earnings well above the average teacher's salary in Chicago Public Schools (CPS), highlighting the leadership role's importance.

How Salary Is Determined

The salary is usually set through internal union processes, with input from the executive committee and membership approval. It takes into consideration the workload, level of responsibility, and comparable salaries for similar union leadership positions. Transparency in the salary-setting process is essential for maintaining trust among union members and stakeholders.

Negotiation and Contract Cycles

Periods of intense contract negotiations or labor disputes can affect the salary structure, sometimes leading to temporary stipends or bonuses. The CTU president's role in these cycles is critical, and compensation may reflect the added responsibilities during such times.

Union Financial Health
