History and Origin of the Museum of Broken Relationships

The Museum of Broken Relationships was originally founded in Zagreb, Croatia, in 2010 by artists Olinka Vištica and Dražen Grubišić. It began as a small collection of personal items symbolizing the end of relationships, donated by people from around the world. The concept quickly gained international attention for its emotional depth and unique approach to documenting human experiences of love and loss. The museum's founders aimed to create a space where visitors could confront the bittersweet reality of breakups while appreciating the shared vulnerability that binds humanity.

Conceptual Foundation and Growth

The museum's core concept revolves around the idea that broken relationships leave behind physical and emotional artifacts that tell powerful stories. Each item displayed is accompanied by a short narrative explaining its significance, providing insight into the personal histories involved. Over time, the collection expanded, traveling through various international exhibitions before establishing permanent locations. The museum's success lies in its ability to connect deeply with audiences by sharing universally relatable experiences through tangible objects.
