Societal Judgment and Silence

Literary Devices and Structure

Free Verse Form

Repetition and Emphasis

Brooks employs repetition to emphasize key ideas and emotions. Phrases such as "You will never" and "I have heard in the voices" recur, reinforcing the mother's ongoing grief and the permanence of her loss. This technique also helps to create a rhythmic, almost chant-like quality, which deepens the poem's mournful tone.

Direct Address

The poem uses direct address to speak to the aborted children, creating an intimate and personal connection. This approach invites readers to engage with the mother's perspective and fosters empathy for her experience. It also serves to humanize the unborn, making the mother's feelings more palpable.

Symbolism and Imagery

Imagery of Childhood and Innocence

Throughout the poem, Brooks uses vivid imagery associated with childhood—such as "little feet" and "little laughing flowers"—to symbolize innocence and potential. These images evoke the lives that might have been, underscoring the tragedy of loss and the depth of the mother's sorrow.

Symbolism of the Mother Figure

The mother figure in the poem represents both personal and universal experiences of motherhood, loss, and choice. She embodies the conflicting emotions that many women face, making her a powerful symbol of maternal love intertwined with grief and societal pressures.

Use of Sound and Tone
